it, political map lawsuit unfolds

in questioning the validity of the measures in a crowded calendar, could dramatically shift voters' will see a election ballot, voter could bring up a voter initiative changing the constitution, and voter-style questions — in one of the most far-reaching lawsuits ever filed.

Cook County Circuit Court Judge Mary Mikva said she should issue her written decision about the two signature-driven ballot questions by noon on June 27. She could reject both, keep both or make a split decision.

One group, the "Committee on Legislative Reform and Term Limits," led by Republican gubernatorial candidate Bruce Rauner, calls for limiting legislators to 8 years in office, changing the sizes of the House and Senate and making it harder for lawmakers to override a governor's veto.

The other group, "Yes for Independent Maps," wants an independent commission to take over how the state draws its political boundaries instead of leaving it to lawmakers. That effort has hit a snag after the Illinois State Board of Elections found more than half of the signatures in a sample were invalid. Election officials presented the group with a new way to verify signatures Thursday, but some say they need the original limits and term limits removed from the ballot. "With the changes, the commission could not be approved," said "Yes" spokesman Michael Tamm. "It's too aggressive," attorney Michael Kasper, who argued in opposition to the measures, said in court of the redistricting measure. "It goes too far."

requirements, would change rules for seeking office, and would affect the governor's powers. The Illinois Supreme Court has previously held a narrow definition for changing the constitution through a voter initiative.

"It's too aggressive," attorney Michael Kasper, who argued in opposition to the measures, said in court of the redistricting measure. "It goes too far."

ILLINOIS BOARD OF ELECTIONS

Illinois' term limits ballot measure

"to everyone else," he said during the meeting. "This is a delusional."

He said the measure would only affect the "trifecta" and members of the legislature.

He said the measure doesn't meet those requirements, and that changes rules have to be made to make it affect the entire state.

He said the measure would affect the entire state's power. The Illinois Supreme Court has previously held a narrow definition to changing the constitution through a voter initiative.

The term limits issue has crept into the governor's race, with Flanagan trying to increase his support.

Gov. Pat Quinn, a Democrat who backs term limits, has been trying to increase his support because it would increase the size of the Illinois House. In 1960, Quinn has a strict no-term-limits position. He has previously held the only voter initiative to make it on the ballot.

He said he would like the measure to pass because it would give residents a choice.

Flanagan, a former state representative, called the measure "an important step forward for the people of Illinois who deserve the opportunity to vote on term limits and other issues that affect them."

He said the measure would be on the ballot in November and asked voters to answer questions on a ballot measure that would increase the minimum wage and the minimum wage.
